The Dão region may be described as a plateau surrounded by several mountain ranges, offering conditions in terms of granitic soil, continental climate and grape varieties like Touriga Nacional and Tinta Roriz. Located in the heart of Portugal it sometimes likened to Portugal's Burgundy. Officially demarcated in 1908, the Dão region is one of the oldest wine regions of Portugal, and it was the religious orders, particularly the monks of the Cistercian Order, that spread the culture of the vineyard during the Middle Ages, which has expanded regularly since then.
